Strike resolution passed

Senate meets

Group opposes court decision

by Sharon Taylor

Tomorrow, people from Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal will converge on Parliament Hill to protest the judgement by the Quebec Court of Appeals overriding Indian rights in the James Bay area.

The Montreal branch of the demonstration is being organized by the Ad Hoc Committee for Justice on James Bay. The committee was formed this week by McGill anthropology professor Peter Sindell, Loyola communications professor Gail Valaskakis, free-lance journalists Boyce Richardson (author of the book on James Bay's plight, "The Plot to Flood the Northwoods") and Jean-Pierre Fournier, together with Helene Lajambe and Dorothy Rosenberg. Sindell said the committee was formed to express

"outrage at the mockery of justice" that has occurred over the James Bay decision.

The purpose of the demonstration, said Sindell, is to "draw the attention of the people in Parliament to the gross miscarriage of justice that occurred when the federal government pressed the Cree and Inuit people of James Bay and northern Quebec to give up their rights, instead of upholding the rights so forcefully confirmed by Mr. Justice Malouf's decision in the Quebec Supreme Court."

Two weeks ago the Cree and Inuit peoples were granted an injunction by Malouf halting all work on the James Bay project, on the grounds that their rights to possess and use the land are established in legislative acts dating from 1763 until 1912.

However, when the James Bay Development Corporation appealed the decision, three Appeals Court judges lifted the suspension of work in a hearing that lasted less than two days. Without reference to the Malouf judgement or to Indian rights, the Appeals Court said the work which Malouf said is irreparably damaging Indian rights, should be continued. In addition, the judges insisted that the Indians show cause why the work should not resume.

The James Bay Development Corporation claimed that the energy crisis made building the project a matter of urgency and vital public interest. However, Malouf stated that the evidence was contradictory concerning Quebec's energy needs.

J. Daniel Khazzoom, an economics professor at McGill, testified at the James Bay hearings that there is a surplus of electricity in Quebec and that Quebec is selling massive amounts of electricity to Ontario and New York. Hydro-Quebec recently published a statement in The Gazette urging all people to use electricity. Also, power production at Churchill and Manic Falls is not even up to full capacity at the present time.

Between 2,000 and 5,000 people are expected at tomorrow's demonstration.

Buses will be leaving from the Roddick Gates at 9 a.m. tomorrow for the demonstration, which will take place between noon and 2 p.m., and returning about 5 p.m. There will be a charge of $4.50 to cover transportation costs.

McGill Senate passed a resolution yesterday supporting students who, in the event of a strike, respect the strike picket lines. Arts student senator Stephen Fogarty, the motion's sponsor, said "it places the onus on the professor to help the students out" under strike circumstances.

The resolution reads as follows: "In the eventuality of a strike at McGill University, other than an illegal strike, the teaching staff, whether they continued in their normal duties or not, shall endeavor to mitigate any academic hardship to students whether the students crossed the picket lines or not." This version of Fogarty's motion was passed after numerous amendments and lengthy debate.

The government's proposal on the reorganization of university education was discussed by Senate for the third successive session. Fogarty said that "the government is trying to get increasing control over universities and McGill is telling them to step back."

Warkentin directs new program

by Don Spencer

McGill has a commitment to look at the environment in a global context and to make students sensitive to the environment. This is the opinion of professor Benno Warkentin, coordinator of the university's new Environmental Studies program.

The undergraduate elective program is multi-disciplinary and inter-university, drawing on economics and geography as well as the faculties of Religious Studies, Law, Management, Engineering and Agriculture. It is being run in cooperation with Sir George Williams University and Loyola College.

"The program is a drawing of a framework of environmental studies," according to Warkentin, a soil science professor at Macdonald College and author of a report on Environmental Studies. "The courses being offered are those that examine interrelationships, and so are a synthesis instead of an analysis of the data."

Short term environmental problems, such as pollution, will be de-emphasized in favour of long term problems such as public attitudes, land use, energy and resources. The program aims at giving students a background to relate their specific disciplines to long-term environmental problems, and to study the environmental changes required to go from a "growth" to an "equilibrium" society. Warkentin hopes it will also give the university the capacity to respond to complex environmental problems faced by communities and governments.

One such problem is the present "energy crisis" which Warkentin sees as likely to cause immediate ecological damage such as the James Bay project or relaxation of industrial pollution standards. But this crisis may, in his view, cause a greater awareness of environmental problems among the general public.

Course structure will be mainly lecture-oriented although some "modules" will be used to provide supplemental material for students without a background in a particular subject. Warkentin does not foresee the program becoming an honours or majors program, since this would remove its unique multi-disciplinary character.

"These courses," Warkentin explains in the report, "which are not designed for majors in a discipline, could have the added advantage of being humanities courses for scientists, science courses for humanities, etc. Aesthetics and ethics are a necessary part of Environmental Studies."

He also feels interdisciplinary Environmental Studies serve to fulfill one of the university's roles — "to provide the place in which faculty and students can discover, examine critically, preserve, and transmit the knowledge, wisdom, and values that will help ensure the survival of the present and future generations with improvement in the quality of life."

Warkentin said McGill's program was designed specifically for this university, drawing on existing resources here. Similar programs have been implemented at York and Waterloo universities and at Dartmouth College. At Dartmouth it is possible to take a "minor" in environmental studies while majoring in almost any other subject, and at York a master's degree in environmental studies is being planned.

A tentative Environmental Studies curriculum has been drawn up at McGill that includes 38 courses in 16 departments. Among these are such diverse courses as "the Human Condition," "Resource Biology," and "Intermediate Urban Geography."

Warkentin admits that the program will probably never draw large groups of students although it has yet to get into full swing. Since it has a small budget it cannot afford to subsidize research work in the field. But it is clear, the report says, that one of the most significant concerns in Canada is the relationship of man to his environment, and that traditional educational facilities do not have the scope to deal adequately with the issue.

Erratum

The final score of the McGill-MacDonald basketball game was mistakenly reported at 84-66 for McGill, and score during the last six minutes of play was reported as 11-8 for MacDonald. The final score was 84-46 for McGill and the latter statistic was actually 13-8 for MacDonald.

New Library Hours

Comment on Residents Cautionary Fee

To the editor:

We would like to call your attention and that of your readers to several misrepresentative statements in yesterday's front page article entitled "Residents oppose fee." We would like to express our disappointment with Robert Shepherd's choice to report only Mike Sweeney's version of this story and with his poor topic research.

Entire statements made at the McConnell Hall House Committee meeting in question were taken totally out of context and attributed to the wrong people. Mike Sweeney's quote at the end of the article strongly linked Dick Viscarello with an implied deliberate postponement of the cautionary fee issue. This is a misinterpretation of the statement which Dick Viscarello made when approached by your reporter. In fact he stated, "After the general meeting on November 18, I was under the impression that the purpose of the house committee meeting was to formulate alternatives to the fee for coming years. These alternatives were to be given to the administration for their consideration. If one of the plans met with their approval and could be quickly implemented, it would be put into effect in time for second semester. The administration is open for students' suggestions but is not necessarily bound to abide to them." The undersigned strongly disapprove of this attempt to present a false impression of ideas and persons involved.

In the article, Dick Viscarello reportedly claimed "...the opinions of the students would...have no weight" and Jon Pang reportedly objected to his declaration that this would indeed be a questionnaire and not a ballot. In fact, it was quite obvious to most at the meeting that the meeting itself was merely to formulate possible alternatives to the present system of a cautionary fee. The upcoming "vote" on the proposed alternatives was called a "questionnaire" rather than a "ballot" due to the fact that its outcome will be in no way binding on the decision of the residence administration. The results will, however, give the administration an indication of the opinion of the residents of McConnell Hall.

Furthermore, Pang and Viscarello agreed, rather than disagreed, that this was to be a questionnaire. It was, interestingly enough, Bonomo and Sweeney (who was not in any way a part of the organization of the house committee) that repeatedly put forward the "ballot" idea. This was a useless exercise in light of the nature of the meeting and the entire cautionary fee question. Bonomo and Sweeney also repeatedly argued about the "legality" of the $50 fee (in reference to the Resident contract). This was only a further aggravation as the legality was not being discussed and because the House Committee is not empowered to make decisions of this sort, as stated in the McConnell Hall Constitution.

The House Committee is an elected group of nine students with a chairman elected from the members at the first meeting. It is designed to "...hear charges brought against any resident for offenses committed against Residence Complex..." The House Committee is thus an investigative and recommending body only. The question of cautionary fee was being discussed, since assessment of damages is related to offenses against the Residence Complex.

Now that we have clarified the purpose of the House Committee and its meeting on November 25, it becomes obvious from statements in the article, statements made by Sweeney and Bonomo at the meeting, and from Mr. Sweeney's quote at the end of the article, that these two people were using the meeting to air their personal grievances and to further their own interests. We strongly suggest that if they are to pursue this objective, they should do it through channels other than our House Committee.

Students and the Daily -Council Fight

To the editor:

"This is a sign that the whole campus is behind our cause": this statement is put forth in some form or another by either the McGill Daily or the Students' Society executive—depending on who voted for whom, attended this meeting or wrote that letter. But what does the support of a few hundred tell us about the thousands of students on campus? What of those who haven't indicated their feelings in the endless Daily-Council fight? Maybe many students feel it's not worth expressing their opinion in what is obviously a case of incessant political rivalry. Maybe they have better things to do—like go to school. Maybe they don't care. Maybe they're fed up with the whole thing.

Meanwhile, both sides are claiming to be supported by the majority of the student population. Phrases in the Daily like "the oft-maligned, permanently hassled McGill student" sound like "you and me against them, eh, pal, buddy? eh?" I guess this is supposed to make us feel that the Daily is on our side all the way. The truth is, especially for people who weren't here last year, that both the Daily and the Council are here because there's nothing much we can do about it. But whether we are claimed as supporters or not depends very heavily on what faculty we're in, what our political leanings are, and whether we're even interested in campus politics.

It's too bad I haven't heard more from the executive of the Students' Society; I might have more material for examples. Unfortunately, the only source of information most of us have access to is the Daily, which screams about how representative it is, and then presents its side of the argument totally clouded in hysteria. For example, "This is where the picture of such-and-such would be if we'd had the money to print it." This gives the impression that 1) readers are so stupid they must have it pointed out to them that there are no pictures in the Daily; 2) the Daily's position is so tenuous that they must resort to arguing petty points; 3) the Daily journalists are all twelve years old.

Of course the Daily is pro-Daily. But this kind of hysterical writing displays childishness and vindictiveness. I thought these two traits were supposed to be the prerogatives of the Students' Society executive! This sort of asshole journalism (I refer in particular to Nigel Gibson's article in last Wednesday's Daily) which evoked mental pictures of women's oppression, goldfish swallowing, and panty-raids to explain the motives of the Students' Society executive, reads like hate literature. At best it is irresponsible, and at worst, if the Daily's beefs were really all that legitimate, unnecessary. It distorts facts, provokes anger, and guarantees further ideological battles. But this is what going to school is all about, isn't it?
